Summer is fast approaching, and with it comes the concern of some weather experts who are predicting that this summer will be a real scorcher. Several meteorologists expect that many areas of the Central Coast and of Southern California will see prolonged triple digit temperatures this summer. Summer and the hot temperatures are always a concern since dehydration while either working outdoors or enjoying the sun is a possibility. Taking their concerns into consideration as the summer approaches should prompt businesses to revisit their Heat Illness Prevention Program. Employers will want to ensure that they are ready to help keep their employees safe, hydrated, and healthy. Please join us as we revisit the Heat Illness Prevention Program requirements and the potential considerations businesses may need to address in the era of COVID-19.

A Cal/OSHA study identified the key role that supervisors play in preventing worker fatalities due to heat illness. The findings highlighted the value of training supervisors so that they can make the fullest use of their supervisory power to control safety on the job.

Do your supervisors know and understand their obligations with respect to:

- Potable drinking water
- Shade requirements
- Cool-down rest periods
- High heat procedure requirements
- Emergency response procedures
- Responding to signs & symptoms of a heat illness
- Acclimatization
- Training for supervisors and employees
- The written Heat Illness Prevention Plan
- Does COVID 19 impact these elements and if it does, how?
